Re : Strategy Consultant (Remote)

Turning complex data into business cases that senior leadership can act on, and doing it through cross-functional workshops rather than isolated analysis, is where this role gets interesting. A Fortune 500 client transforming core business processes needs recommendations that hold up under scrutiny from finance, IT, and operations at the same time, not just a clean deck.

That's the environment I've worked in for 25 years, on the insurance and finance side specifically. At CNP, I rebuilt investment accounting production under Solvency II constraints, covering €350bn in assets, delivered in 18 months, on schedule, with finance, actuarial, and IT stakeholders aligned throughout. That meant running the kind of workshops this role calls for: getting groups with different priorities to agree on a target operating model and then holding them to it. On the analytical side, I've built ROI and performance frameworks for closing and reporting processes, translating control gaps into business cases with clear financial impact for CFOs and steering committees, the same discipline needed to inform positioning and growth strategy here.

Remote delivery isn't new either. My last engagement at Clearwater ran fully distributed, and I'm comfortable owning workstreams independently without daily supervision. I haven't worked directly with Tableau or Power BI; my data visualization work has mostly run through Excel, VBA, and system-native reporting tools. Happy to walk through specifics on a call.
