Re : Chief of Staff / Direction de la Transformation

Structuring a multi-year transformation program while keeping senior leadership aligned across organizational design, operating model optimization, and new entity integration is the real test behind a Chief of Staff role like this one. It calls for someone who can move between strategic analysis and the operational discipline of delivery, inside an international, matrixed environment.

At SCOR, I spent four years in the investment function, including two as chief transformation officer, working directly with senior leadership on the function's operating model and strategic priorities. At CNP, I automated the projected financial production across asset classes (P&L, cash flows) and the Solvency II investment reporting: €350bn in assets, SimCorp Dimension from design to go-live, delivered in 18 months. More recently, as senior programme director for Clearwater, I piloted several parallel implementations of an R to R SaaS solution, running monthly sponsor committees at executive level and consolidating deliverables, milestones, and resources on a dedicated tool (Monday.com), for clients including Luxempart.

That combination of strategic structuring, program governance, and hands-on execution in insurance and in finance is what this role needs, and a European leader undergoing transformation at this scale is where I want to put it to work.

I operate as an independent consultant today. Nevertheless, I am perfectly open to a permanent role in France, either immediately or after an initial engagement period, given the scope and visibility of this position.

I would be happy to discuss how this experience applies to the Group's current transformation priorities.

Best regards,

Xavier Robitaille
