Dear Cegedim Assurances,

I'm applying for your Director of Projects role because my 25 years in insurance—focused on delivery, regulatory complexity, and stakeholder alignment—directly match what you need to scale your back-office implementations.

Most project directors know either software or insurance well. I know both. At Expert Zone Advisory, I've spent the last five years embedding myself in exactly your problem space: managing multi-workstream deployments where finance, operations, and IT pull in different directions. I've led tiers payant transformations, regulatory reporting redesigns, and SaaS platform rollouts for mutual insurers and compagnies. The skill that matters most—getting 15 different people to agree on what "done" means and then delivering it—I do routinely.

Concrete example: I recently managed a six-month full operating model redesign for a mid-sized insurer, coordinating claims, accounting, and IT simultaneously. We delivered on time, within scope, and the client renewed our contract within a month. No fanfare, just the blocking and tackling that keeps projects from failing.

There's one honest thing to flag: I've built my career as an independent consultant and interim leader, not through corporate structures. That's a gap if your team needs someone who'll navigate Cegedim's internal politics seamlessly. That said, I've worked inside enough large groups to understand how they move. I adapt fast.

I'm ready to talk about how I'd approach your current portfolio and what early wins look like.
