

Managing Principal roles demand someone who can build and scale advisory teams while deepening client relationships in capital markets. That's where I can add immediate value to Capco.

Over 25 years in finance and insurance transformation, I've spent the last decade advising buy-side and sell-side institutions on regulatory reporting, operating model redesign, and complex technology delivery—the exact intersection where Capco operates. Most recently, I led a post-M&A finance integration for a major investment bank, where I rebuilt their reporting architecture across three regulatory jurisdictions, cut month-end close from 12 to 6 days, and embedded 15 junior consultants into the client's permanent team. That's the kind of measurable, durable outcome your promise emphasizes.

What sets me apart is comfort with the messy middle—the gap between strategy and execution. I've learned to translate business risk into operational levers, speak credibly with CFOs and compliance teams alike, and ship without sacrificing quality. I know how to build trust fast with sceptical clients and mentor teams who can work independently.

I'm currently independent (Expert Zone Advisory), which means I move at Capco speed and carry no institutional baggage. The trade-off is clear: you'd be shifting from freelance flexibility to a committed, full-time leadership role. That's exactly the move I'm ready for—I want to build something, stay in one place, and develop a team that compounds.

Let's talk about the capital markets book and where you see the biggest client friction points right now.
