I bring 25 years of insurance and finance expertise to roles where technical depth, regulatory clarity, and delivery discipline matter. That combination is rare. I've spent my entire career in this space—not adjacent to it—which means I understand both the complexity underneath and how to communicate it up.

What I do well: step into situations where finance, actuariat, compliance, and operations need to move together. I've redesigned closing processes for firms managing billions in assets, led PMO governance through multi-year transformation programs, and rebuilt financial reporting frameworks to survive regulatory scrutiny. The pattern across these missions: clarity under pressure, stakes that matter, teams that need someone who can think.

On a recent engagement managing financial consolidation for a mid-cap insurer, I reduced month-end close from 15 days to 8, reshaped the control framework to pass audit without rework, and handed off a documented process that lasted. The same firm brought me back twice. Not because I was the loudest in the room, but because the work held.

I should be direct about the fit: I operate best in interim or project mandates where I own a clear scope and can move fast. I'm energized by problems with real constraints—not politics, but genuine complexity. If the role is fixed CDI with traditional corporate dynamics, that might not be the right match. But if you need someone who can land quickly, deliver durability, and leave something that works, we should talk.
