I'm a senior consultant with 25 years in finance and insurance—exactly where derivatives, collateral, and regulatory complexity converge. What SimCorp needs now isn't theoretical knowledge; it's someone who can translate complex solutions into execution that clients trust and regulators accept.

I've spent two decades designing and delivering in this space. At a major French insurer, I led a three-year collateral and counterparty risk transformation across 15 European entities—rebuilding processes, governance, and reporting from the ground up. The result: €2.3B in freed collateral, 40% faster month-end close, and SOX compliance on first audit. More recently, I've advised on derivatives valuation frameworks and investment operations redesigns for buy-side firms managing portfolios north of €50B.

What matters here: I don't just understand the domain. I know how to move from design to live delivery without losing stakeholders along the way. I've sat in rooms with CFOs, risk committees, and trading ops teams. I speak their language because I've had to solve their real problems—competing priorities, legacy constraints, regulatory pressure, all at once.

The gap is honest: I've worked as an independent consultant and interim executive, not as a traditional employee. For the right mission—one with genuine complexity and client-facing impact—I'm interested in a different structure. SimCorp's model, with its focus on outcomes and horizontal delivery, aligns with how I think.

Let's talk about what you're actually trying to achieve with the IOS Value Team. I'm confident I can accelerate it.
