I bring 25 years of insurance and finance expertise—the kind that matters when technical requirements collide with regulatory constraints and execution pressure. As a senior interim finance manager and PMO lead, I've spent my career closing gaps between what finance needs, what operations can deliver, and what regulators require.

Here's what I actually do: I redesign processes that are broken but look fine on paper. I build PMO discipline into organizations that need it but resist it. I translate between actuaries, CFOs, and IT teams so they stop talking past each other. On a recent mandate, I led the redesign of a closing process for a €2B insurance portfolio—cut the timeline 40%, cut manual controls by half, built audit-proof documentation. Before that, I restructured an AMOA function for a large mutual insurer facing major regulatory reporting changes.

I work best on high-visibility missions where clarity and execution discipline move the needle. I'm comfortable with ambiguity at the start, but I don't tolerate it once we're moving. I push back on scope creep and unclear sponsorship—not to be difficult, but because that's where mandates fail.

One fair point: I'm freelance by design. I've run my own consulting firm for years because I prefer mandate clarity and scope boundaries over open-ended employment. If this role has those qualities, we'll work well together.
