I bring 25 years of hands-on expertise in insurance and finance transformation—exactly what your Investment Management team needs. My track record combines PMO discipline, business analyst rigor, and the ability to navigate complex stakeholder landscapes where regulatory constraints and delivery pressure collide. I've spent my career in roles where finance, operations, and technology must align, which is precisely where I add the most value.

Over the past decade, I've led transformation programs for major financial services players. Most recently, I redesigned operating models for insurance platforms facing regulatory reporting overhauls—delivering process standardization across 15+ business units while reducing control gaps by 40%. I've also managed PMO functions for large-scale digitalization projects, where my discipline in scope definition and team management kept complex engagements on track and on budget. These weren't theoretical exercises; they required me to translate business strategy into executable work plans, build and coach junior teams, and maintain client relationships under real pressure.

What distinguishes me: I think in systems. I don't optimize one process in isolation—I map dependencies, identify where technology (automation, AI) creates leverage, and design solutions that actually fit the client's organizational reality. I'm fluent in both the language of finance professionals and the constraints that regulators impose. This makes me effective at building buy-in across functions that don't always speak the same dialect.

I'm currently independent, which means I've chosen each engagement deliberately and delivered results clients needed enough to renew. That autonomy comes with trade-offs—I understand that a CDI role offers continuity and team depth that freelance work doesn't. I'm interested in that trade-off, especially for a team where I can build something sustained.
