I bring 25 years of insurance and finance expertise directly aligned with this role—particularly in regulatory reporting, new business processes, and cross-functional delivery where technical rigour and stakeholder alignment matter most. As Head of New Business Reporting, I'd lead with the discipline L&G needs: robust oversight of IFRS and Solvency II outputs, process ownership that scales, and the actuarial credibility to partner effectively with Planning, Finance, and PRT teams.

My recent work sits exactly here. At a major UK insurer, I redesigned the finance operating model for a £40bn retirement book, which meant rebuilding new business reporting controls, aligning actuarial inputs with finance workflows, and embedding governance that survived regulatory scrutiny. The output: faster close, cleaner data, and auditor confidence. I've also spent two years managing PMO programmes across insurance transformation—the discipline of delivery, stakeholder management, and translating technical requirements into executable plans translates directly to leading a reporting team through change.

What I bring beyond technical competence: I solve the friction between functions. Actuaries, finance teams, and operations often speak different languages. I don't. I've managed teams (4–8 people typically), I've owned end-to-end processes, and I've reported to CFOs and Chief Risk Officers. I'm genuinely energized by clarity—turning complexity into structured, auditable outputs.

One honest note: I've built my career as a senior consultant and interim leader. I'm open to the right permanent role, and this one signals it clearly—the scope, the team, the visibility, and the challenge of embedding reporting rigour at scale in a mature, regulated business is the work I want to do.

I'd welcome a conversation about how I'd structure the first 90 days and what success looks like in year one.
