Your Financial Services practice needs someone who bridges the gap between boardroom strategy and regulatory reality. That's the value I bring: 25 years of insurance transformation work where I've spent equal time designing operating models and fixing the messy delivery underneath.

At Deloitte, you'd want me on closing redesigns, AMOA program leadership, and control framework reviews—exactly what this Senior Manager role describes. I've done this work twice over. Last three years, I ran interim CFO-level programs for two mid-cap insurers: one involved redesigning the entire accounting close (reduced cycle time by 40%, cut manual controls from 18 to 4), the other was a regulatory reporting overhaul with ACPR alignment before a capital raise. Both required someone comfortable translating between Finance, Actuariat, IT, and Risk simultaneously. Both hit their targets.

The honest thing: I've been independent for five years. I prefer it—keeps me sharp, and I can move fast without process drag. But I've also seen where a firm like Deloitte adds real leverage: access to repeatable playbooks, deeper client relationships, and the ability to run bigger programs with bench support. This role is where those two things align for me. You get someone who's seen the detail work and can lead teams through it. I'm not learning on the job.

I'm not looking to relocate decision-making to headquarters. I work to deliver, and this position—especially open to remote work—gives me the setup to do that within a structure that actually matters to me.

Let's talk about where you need the most traction right now.
