

I'm a senior consultant with 25 years in insurance and finance—and I've spent the last decade building and scaling PMOs in exactly this context: lean, mission-critical businesses where the foundations exist but need real structure to unlock growth.

What caught my attention here is that this isn't a large-corporate playbook problem. You need someone who can assess what's broken, design proportionate governance that sticks, and then roll up their sleeves to make it work alongside a small, high-ownership team. That's where I add the most value.

Most recently, I led a complete PMO redesign for a mid-sized insurance platform scaling into new underwriting lines. Started by mapping the actual operating model—not the theoretical one—and built a governance framework that the board trusted but the teams could live with. Within four months, we'd reduced delivery friction by 40% and clarified portfolio prioritisation so clearly that the CFO and Chief Underwriter stopped fighting over resource allocation. I also embedded a structured approach to new product development that gave the business the confidence to expand into three new specialty segments.

Before that, I spent two years as interim delivery lead for a major insurance transformation programme, translating C-suite strategy into executable roadmaps, running the steering cadence, and keeping a distributed team aligned when priorities shifted weekly.

I should be direct: I've been independent for the last five years, and this role is clearly a full-time hire. That's a genuine transition for me, but the mission here—building the operating backbone for ambitious growth in a specialist market—is exactly the kind of challenge I want to commit to long-term.

I'm based in Paris, so three days a week in London works well. Happy to talk through how I'd approach the first 90 days.
