Your PMO and Value Management Lead role sits at the intersection of governance, delivery control, and value realization—exactly where I've spent 25 years adding measurable impact in insurance and finance.

I've led PMO functions through large transformation programmes where clarity on investment prioritization and benefits tracking made the difference between a well-governed portfolio and organizational chaos. At a major European insurer, I designed and operated a programme PMO framework supporting €150M+ in transformation spend across actuarial, finance, and operational refits. The discipline I built—standardized governance, real-time benefit tracking, portfolio-level reporting aligned to OKRs—meant leadership actually knew which programmes were delivering value and where to reallocate resources.

I also spent three years as interim Finance Manager with responsibility for cost and benefits management across a complex regulatory reporting transformation. That's where I learned that a PMO without financial rigour is just process theatre, and a finance function without PMO discipline is chaos. Both matter. The 50/50 split you describe isn't a conflict for me; it's coherent work.

What I bring: hands-on PMO management (I've run small teams doing exactly what you describe—governance, reporting, controls), deep insurance domain knowledge so I speak the language of your stakeholders, and a bias toward measurement and accountability that works in cultures built on innovation and execution.

The shift from my current consulting model to a fixed leadership role is something I'm actively considering. I'm looking for a mandate where I can build something durable, not rotate through engagements. This role feels like it.

I'm based in France but relocating to London isn't a barrier—I've worked across European insurance markets for years. Happy to discuss how I'd approach your portfolio and programme setup.
