Senior Manager, Finance Transformation – Dublin

I've spent 25 years building finance systems in insurance and banking. What caught my attention here isn't the title—it's the scope: you're not just modernising processes, you're redefining how finance thinks and operates at scale.

My last three roles sit directly in this space. At a €4bn French insurer, I led the redesign of the entire close cycle across 12 entities—standardised 47 manual processes, embedded automated controls, cut close time by 35%, and moved the finance team from maintenance mode to strategy. The work required the exact triangle this role demands: translating business needs into system design with IT, embedding governance from day one, and driving adoption when people preferred the old way.

Before that, I managed the PMO for a regulatory reporting transformation across 8 countries—rebuilding data pipelines, reshaping the finance operating model, navigating SOX compliance in parallel. It taught me that transformation isn't really about tools; it's about clarity, sequencing, and getting sceptical stakeholders to believe the future is worth the effort.

I've also led finance function redesigns where the CFO's priorities shifted halfway through—I'm used to resetting stakeholder alignment without losing momentum.

The honest gap: I've been freelance for five years now, building my own consulting practice. I moved away from permanent roles because I wanted control over the work. But a 12-month contract with real scope, a global footprint, and a B Corp that's serious about embedding change? That pulls me back. I'm ready to own this end-to-end, not just advise on it.

I'm based in France but Dublin is familiar ground. Happy to discuss how my background maps to what you're building.
