With 25 years in insurance and finance, I've spent my career delivering complex programmes where technical rigour meets stakeholder alignment—exactly what this Senior Project Manager role demands.

At QBE Europe, I'd own £1–2m programmes the way I've consistently delivered them: clear scoping upfront, cross-functional discipline, and unflinching budget/timeline management. My recent work includes redesigning finance operating models for major insurers, where I led simultaneous workstreams across Finance, Actuariat, and IT—managing vendor relationships, internal stakeholders, and regulatory constraints with equal weight. One programme alone touched 12 teams and ran £3.2m over 18 months. I delivered on time and budget because I treat change management and stakeholder communication as engineering problems, not soft skills.

What sets me apart: I'm not a PMO robot. I read the business underneath the project. I've spent enough time in underwriting, reserving, and regulatory reporting to spot when a programme is solving the real problem or just moving the furniture. That context matters when you're reshaping how markets teams work.

I should be direct about the structure: I'm currently independent (Expert Zone Advisory), which is deliberately chosen flexibility, not instability. I'm ready for the right permanent role—and QBE's hybrid setup in London speaks to how the market evolves. The work excites me more than the contract type.

I have the right to work in the UK (French national, established in UK operations). Happy to discuss flexible arrangements if that's relevant.

I'd welcome a conversation about how you're thinking about programme delivery challenges and team structure. I'm available for a call on short notice.
