Dear Cegedim Assurances,

I'm applying for the Director of Insurance Health Projects role because my 25 years in insurance delivery, combined with deep PMO and stakeholder alignment experience, directly address what you need: someone who can pilot complex back-office implementations while keeping commercial commitments, quality standards, and cross-functional teams in sync.

What matters here is that I've done this work repeatedly. I've led full-cycle implementations for major insurers—from pre-sales technical positioning through go-live and stabilization—where the cost of delay or misalignment runs into millions. I've coordinated IT, operations, compliance, and business teams when priorities clashed. I've managed scope against fixed timelines. I understand the regulatory and operational constraints that make healthcare insurance projects unforgiving.

Most recently I've worked as an independent consultant across transformation programs in finance and insurance, which means I've seen how projects succeed or fail from the inside: clarity of objectives, realistic planning, relentless follow-up, and the ability to tell leadership hard truths early. That's the discipline I bring.

One honest point: I've been freelance for several years now. I'm genuinely interested in returning to a structured team environment where the work is substantial and the mission matters. Cegedim's position in healthcare tech infrastructure appeals to me precisely because the problems are real and the stakes are high.

I'd welcome a conversation about how my background maps to your deployment challenges and the team you're building.

Best regards,

Xavier Robitaille
