I'm a consultant who works where technical depth, regulatory constraints, and delivery pressure intersect—exactly where insurance transformation lives.

Over 25 years in insurance and finance, I've spent most of that time inside the operating model: refactoring processes, aligning finance with actuarial and IT, building PMO discipline on complex programmes. That background matters for digital transformation in insurance. The strategic work—roadmaps, data strategy, AI use cases—only holds if operations can actually execute it.

On a recent mandate with a major mutual, I helped restructure their end-to-end claims process, cutting cycle time by 35% while embedding the digital touchpoints and automation logic needed for the roadmap. The DSI, operations, and finance teams had been stuck on what "modern" meant in practice. Clear operating model design and governance unblocked them.

I'm currently independent, which gives me flexibility and the perspective of an outsider. The trade-off is I'm not looking for a permanent role right now. But if Julhiet Sterwen has a senior consultant track with project-based engagement—whether fixed-term or ongoing—I'd be interested to talk about how that could work. The firm's dual focus on business and people dimensions resonates; transformation without operational credibility is just a deck.

I'm based in the Paris region and available to start quickly.
