Re : Program Manager with French

Leading delivery for a single global account across Poland, India, the Netherlands, and France, while keeping C-suite conversations in Paris coherent with governance in every other region, is a different job from running one program in one country. That's the specific difficulty in this role, and it's where a program manager either earns trust or loses the client's confidence within the first quarter.

At CNP, I rebuilt investment accounting production under Solvency II constraints across 350 billion euros in assets, delivered in 18 months, on schedule, coordinating actuarial, IT, and finance teams that didn't naturally align. That required the same discipline this role asks for: translating a technical mandate into a delivery plan that different stakeholders could actually execute against, then reporting progress in terms the client's leadership trusted. I've also led migration and cutover programs where UAT, data reconciliation, and go-live sequencing across multiple workstreams had to hold together under fixed deadlines, with no room for the kind of silent slippage that erodes a client relationship. That's close to what "delivery continuity across regions" means in practice here.

I haven't managed a distributed team spanning India specifically, though I've worked cross-region governance with the Netherlands and Poland-based teams in past programs.

I currently work as an independent consultant, and I'm open to a permanent role, either directly or after an initial mission period. Happy to walk through how this maps onto your Paris account.
