I bring 25 years in insurance and finance—the kind of depth that matters when technical complexity meets regulatory pressure and delivery timelines are tight. I move fluidly between actuarial constraints, finance operations, and IT delivery, which means I can translate between teams that usually talk past each other.

What I do best: step into situations where the finance or insurance operating model is broken, redesign the process or control framework, then drive execution through the noise. PMO discipline, AMOA rigor, CFO office credibility. I've done this repeatedly—refactoring closing processes that cut month-end cycles by 40%, rebuilding financial reporting infrastructure for regulatory compliance, steering multi-stakeholder programs where misalignment was the real problem.

One concrete example: led a finance transformation for a mid-market insurer where the finance and actuarial teams were operating in separate silos. Redesigned the operating model, implemented controls, reset the governance cadence. Result: 3-week reduction in quarterly close, and actuarial and finance aligned on forecasting for the first time. That's the kind of work where my specific skill set—understanding both the technical requirements and the organizational friction—delivers outsized value.

I should be direct: I work as an independent consultant, usually on interim assignments. That means I move fast, I don't need onboarding time, and I can start immediately. If you're looking for someone embedded long-term in a CDI structure, I may not be the fit. But if you need someone who can diagnose a complex finance or insurance problem, design the solution, and execute it while managing stakeholders, I'm the conversation worth having.
