I've spent 25 years building insurance transformations—from regulatory compliance redesigns to core process digitization. What Harmony is describing with customer journeys, claims automation, and AI-driven fraud detection is exactly where I add the most value: sitting at the intersection of business complexity, technology decisions, and execution discipline.

I've led similar initiatives. At a top-3 French insurer, I redesigned their claims processing operating model, cutting cycle time by 35% while embedding new compliance controls. More recently, I guided a life insurance player through their digital onboarding platform launch—mapping stakeholder requirements across underwriting, sales, and operations, then supporting the build phase. These weren't clean projects; they involved navigating product constraints, regulatory shifts, and teams with competing priorities. That's where clarity and judgment matter most.

I work best as the translator between business intent and technical reality. I don't design systems—I help teams design better ones by making tradeoffs visible and pushing past organizational friction. I build consensus on what "done" actually means before code ships.

One honest note: I'm currently structured as an independent consultant. If the role requires a traditional CDI, we should acknowledge that upfront. But if Harmony engages senior insurance expertise on a contract or hybrid basis, I'm built for exactly this kind of work.

I'd like to discuss how my experience in claims redesign and platform launches maps to your client pipeline. Happy to jump on a call at your convenience.

Best,
Xavier
