I'm a senior insurance consultant with 25 years in the sector, and I've spent the last decade doing exactly what this role demands: aligning fractured business stakeholder groups around a shared product vision, then making sure it actually ships.

At Allianz, you need someone who speaks both languages—business strategy and delivery reality. I've built product roadmaps for claims transformation twice before: once at a top-3 European insurer redesigning their entire claims journey, and again leading the PMO side of a self-serve platform migration across three markets. Both times, the difference came down to one thing: someone who could articulate why the business case matters, own the metrics that prove it, and keep the budget honest when scope creeps or priorities shift.

Here's what landed: in the first engagement, we cut claims processing time by 31% and moved the dial on NPS by 18 points. In the second, we harmonized platforms across operations and customer-facing teams—something that hadn't happened before because no one had formal authority to make those trade-offs stick. The skill isn't technical brilliance; it's the discipline to ask the hard questions, the judgment to say no when it matters, and the credibility with senior stakeholders (CFO, COO, Claims Director, Tech) to make those conversations productive instead of political.

The one honest thing: I've always worked as an interim or contract consultant. I build transformations, hand them off clean, and move on. This 12-month maternity cover role is exactly my pattern—defined scope, clear outcomes, real deadline pressure. I work best in that frame.

I'm based in France but have worked across Ireland, UK, and continental Europe. I'm available to start immediately and happy to discuss how this fits your timeline.
