Having spent 25 years in insurance and finance transformation, I've learned that claims operations reshape themselves around three things: clear business vision, ruthless prioritization, and people who can translate between actuaries and engineers. This role asks for exactly that.

My last two years running interim PMO and business analysis for a major European insurer taught me what "beat the best" actually means in claims. We redesigned end-to-end journeys for three product lines, cut manual handoffs by 64%, and built operating models where self-serve genuinely works instead of just sounding good in strategy decks. The work required constant alignment across Finance, Operations, and IT—stakeholders with different success metrics and real competing pressures. I own the business case. I live in the metrics. I know how to keep the vision steady while the org shifts around it.

What I bring here is less about transformation theory and more about having done this before, in regulated environments where vision needs to sit on actual budget discipline and where "aligned" means people actually move in the same direction. I can articulate what success looks like, I can tell you whether the budget matches the ambition, and I can work the room when priorities collide.

The honest gap: I'm coming from freelance consulting and you're hiring for a fixed-term contract role. That shift suits me fine—I've done embedded interim delivery before and I prefer the clarity. What matters to you is someone who lands fast, doesn't need six months to understand the politics, and delivers a coherent product vision that Finance and Operations and IT can actually execute against. That's the work.

I'm based in the Paris region and Dublin is straightforward logistics. Available to start quickly.

Happy to talk through recent work in detail.
