Dear Hiring Manager,

I'm applying for the Finance Transformation Manager role at Deloitte Budapest because my background sits directly in the intersection of your brief: 25 years in insurance and finance, with deep expertise in operating model redesign, process automation, and shared services scaling.

Over the past decade, I've led transformation programs where finance complexity wasn't abstract—it was real. At a major European insurer, I redesigned the finance operating model across three countries, consolidating regional processes into a centralized shared service hub. That included mapping end-to-end finance workflows, selecting and implementing SAP S/4HANA modules (FI/CO), and introducing process mining to identify automation opportunities. The result: 35% cost reduction and a repeatable model the group deployed to four additional markets. I've also worked extensively with platforms like BlackLine and Anaplan to embed automation and real-time reporting into finance functions—the kind of work that sits at the core of what you're describing.

I bring what consulting needs: the ability to structure messy transformation challenges, communicate clearly upward to C-suite stakeholders, and actually deliver. I speak fluent English and have worked across European markets, though I should be direct that my Hungarian is conversational, not fluent—something I'd address quickly if the role moves forward.

The honest gap: I've worked primarily as an independent consultant and interim manager, not in a traditional consulting firm. That's actually an advantage here—I'm used to operating in ambiguous environments, moving fast, and being accountable for outcomes, not just recommendations. But I understand if you're looking for a standard Big 4 background.

I'm ready to discuss how to translate this experience into your Budapest team's delivery. You can reach me at xro@xavier-robitaille.com or through my calendar link.

Best regards,
