I bring 25 years of insurance expertise—technical depth, delivery rigor, and the ability to align finance, actuariat, IT, and operations around complex transformations. That combination is rare, and it's exactly what digital transformation in insurance demands.

Over the past decade, I've redesigned operating models and led PMO delivery for major insurers and finance teams. On a recent mission at a top-tier French insurer, I mapped and streamlined claims processing across three business lines, reducing cycle time by 35% while embedding regulatory controls. On another, I translated strategy into a target operating model for a €2B+ finance function—including system integration, process design, and governance frameworks. These weren't theoretical exercises; they shipped, and they stuck.

Harmony's brief resonates. You're looking for someone who can move from ideation to design while holding the complexity of products, compliance, customer experience, and IT in one frame. I do that work naturally. I map customer journeys, translate strategy into concrete requirements, and guide implementation teams through the messier parts—where stakeholder incentives collide and decisions matter. I also know insurance: the regulatory layer, the actuarial constraints, the operational reality of claims and policy administration. That knowledge compounds fast in a transformation role.

The honest note: I'm independent and typically work on finite missions. If you're building toward a long-term embedded consultant relationship, we should talk about that structure upfront. But the work itself—and the insurance community you're building—genuinely interests me.
