With 25 years in insurance and finance, I've spent my career exactly where this role needs to be: managing complex international implementations where scope, budget, timeline, and stakeholder alignment determine success or failure.

I currently run Expert Zone Advisory, advising on transformation and delivery across P&C and Life insurance in France and Europe. Most recently, I led a multi-site insurance platform implementation for a €50M+ program—managing five subcontractors, two customer organizations, and internal teams across three countries. We delivered on schedule within budget, and the client renewed for Phase 2. Before that: leading PMO for a regulatory reporting overhaul at a major French insurer, designing process changes that cut closing cycles by 40%, and serving as interim Finance Manager during M&A activity where clarity and execution velocity mattered most.

What makes this role fit: I know the insurance domain from actuarial to operations to IT integration. I've managed matrix environments where nobody reports directly to you but everything depends on alignment. I understand business requirements deeply enough to push back credibly on scope, and I've navigated big international clients (Allianz, AXA, Generali, Covea) where relationship management prevents small problems from becoming big ones.

One honest point: I've been independent for five years. I work project-to-project and thrive in that model. This role seems built for someone building a career inside an organization, and I want to be clear about that difference upfront. That said, if Sapiens is looking for someone who can land running, think like an operator, and deliver without needing months to ramp, I can do that work faster than most.

I'm comfortable with 50% travel and the Vilnius location works. Let's talk about what the first 100 days looks like.
