I bring 25 years of finance and insurance experience directly into transformation programmes where adoption fails without discipline. This role—leading change and readiness for Workday at a specialty insurer—sits exactly where I add most value: translating technical implementation into organisational reality.

My last two years centre on this precise work. I partnered with a top-4 insurer redesigning their finance operating model post-acquisition, which required moving 150+ people through new processes, system cutover, and hypercare. I ran the business readiness workstream, designed role-based training, embedded super-user networks, and reported adoption metrics weekly to the CFO. The transition closed on time with 94% first-day productivity. Before that, I spent 18 months as interim Finance Manager for a £2bn insurer managing regulatory reporting transformation—same blend of technical rigour, stakeholder alignment, and delivery discipline.

I know Workday implementations. I know insurance finance teams. I know the specific resistance you'll face when claiming handlers and underwriters that "the new process is better"—and how to move through it without pretending it's easy.

One honest thing: I'm freelance-based and typically prefer retained roles. This 12-month FTC works because the scope and timeline are clear, and because I want to embed fully in one programme rather than juggle three. I'm London-based and available immediately.

If the fit looks right, I'm straightforward to work with—I report early, escalate cleanly, and don't require managing.

Worth a conversation.
