Your financial services clients face a transformation gap: they need strategy and someone who can actually execute it. Most consultants choose one. Xavier brings both—25 years in insurance and finance, with the rare combination of deep technical knowledge (regulatory reporting, operating models, PMO discipline) and the ability to move large, complex organizations through change.

On his last three engagements, he rebuilt the finance function for a €2B+ insurance group (closing process down 40%), led regulatory reporting transformation across multiple entities, and managed cross-functional alignment on programs where Finance, IT, and Risk had competing priorities. He doesn't theorize about agile transformation—he runs it, with the judgment to know when to push methodology and when to adapt to organizational reality.

What makes him different: he speaks both languages fluently. He can sit with your CFO and your delivery teams in the same conversation without losing either audience. He knows the specific pain points of financial services—Solvency II, IFRS 17, system integration under regulatory pressure—not as abstractions but as operating constraints he's navigated repeatedly.

The honest gap: he's been freelance for several years and built his practice around senior-level interim roles. He's not looking for a junior consultant track. If you're building transformation leadership for your Berlin office and need someone who can partner with partners and move fast without losing rigor, that's different.

Let's talk about what you're actually trying to move. His calendar is here:
