Your Financial Services practice needs someone who's spent 25 years inside the systems, constraints, and cultures of banks and insurers—not observing them from the outside.

I've led transformation programs where the real complexity wasn't the technology. It was aligning actuarial teams with IT, anchoring regulatory reporting to new operating models, and delivering PMO discipline when stakeholder alignment was pulling three directions. At a major insurer, I restructured the Finance function across a €2B portfolio—mapping legacy processes, redesigning controls, and moving from 90-day closes to 45. At another, I piloted a modernization roadmap for a 300-person back office that cut manual touch-points by 35% while strengthening audit trails.

PwC's strength is translating "digital transformation" into coherent strategy. My strength is making it stick operationally. I know where finance and operations teams actually break, what regulatory concerns are real versus theater, and how to sequence change so people adopt it rather than resist it. I speak fluent AMOA, PMO, and CFO Office—the languages that matter when you're managing a €50M+ transformation across multiple business lines.

One honest note: I've built my career as a consultant and interim operator, not as a permanent manager. I'm considering moving into a senior leadership role where I can drive direction and build lasting capabilities, not just hand off to internal teams. A role piloting transformations and scaling the practice appeals to me exactly because it requires both strategic clarity and the operational credibility to make it real.

Let's talk about how you're building the Financial Services practice and what kind of leader you need in the room.
