Re : Global Project Manager

Leading a data governance initiative inside a global transformation programme, without direct authority over the stakeholders who need to move, is the hard part of this role. Getting senior finance, actuarial and IT owners to align on data standards when none of them report to you is where most programmes stall.

That's the exact position I've worked from repeatedly. At CNP, I rebuilt investment accounting production under Solvency II constraints across 350bn€ in assets, coordinating actuarial, risk and IT teams who had no reporting line to me and often conflicting priorities. The programme delivered on time over 18 months because I built the governance structure first: clear data ownership, a single change log, and weekly stakeholder reviews that forced decisions instead of deferring them. On a separate migration project, I ran the UAT and cutover for a new accounting interface, closing out data suspense accounts that had been open for months by getting finance and IT to agree on a single reconciliation source. Both cases needed the same thing this role needs: influence built through clarity and follow-through, not hierarchy.

I've worked fully remote for years, most recently on a Clearwater Analytics implementation, and I'm set up for distributed teams and asynchronous coordination without friction.

As a contractor who is a non-UK Tax resident, based overseas, IR35 does not apply to me.

Happy to walk through the CNP governance model on a call if that's useful.
