Re : Implementation Project Manager – Remote-First

EPI is building the implementation backbone for Wero across a growing number of markets, and that means turning a standard onboarding model into something each acquirer and bank can actually run against without losing track of dependencies. That coordination layer, between the EPI organization and each member's own project team, is where I want to work.

At Clearwater, as senior programme director, I ran several parallel implementations of a Read-to-Run SaaS solution, each with its own sponsor committee at general management level, all tracked on a single consolidated view of deliverables, milestones and resources through Monday.com. One of those engagements was with Luxempart, in Luxembourg. That work was fully remote-first: distributed teams, remote steering committees, and a consolidated tracking tool doing the job that a shared office used to do. It maps directly onto what this role needs: a central point of contact who can hold governance together across banks, acquirers, and internal EPI teams without being in the same room as any of them.

Before that, at CNP, I automated the projected financial production across asset classes (P&L, cash flows) and the Solvency II investment reporting: €350bn in assets, SimCorp Dimension from design to go-live, delivered in 18 months. That project required the same discipline this role asks for: managing a plan across technical, regulatory and business stakeholders who don't share a common language by default, and keeping a steering committee informed without drowning it in detail.

At Coface, IFRS 9 rolled out in stages over four years: successive POCs, ECL methodology, accounting schemes, UAT, coordination with the depositary bank CACEIS. That kind of staged, multi-stakeholder rollout is close to what onboarding a new EPI member across tech, legal, branding and product will require.

I operate as an independent consultant today. Nevertheless, I am perfectly open to a permanent role, directly or after an initial engagement period.

I would be happy to discuss how this experience applies to onboarding EPI's first wave of members.

Best regards,
