Re : VP, Strategic Finance

At a portfolio of software businesses running an active M&A pipeline, forecasting and executive decision support have to hold up at deal speed, not just at quarter-end. That combination of operating rigor and transaction pressure is where I've spent most of my career, just in insurance and asset management instead of software.

At CNP Assurances, I rebuilt the investment accounting function under Solvency II for 350 billion euros in assets under management, delivering the full redesign in 18 months, on schedule, with the capital allocation and reporting logic the regulator needed built in from day one. That work fed directly into board-level materials: I've produced RSR and SFCR reporting packages and QRT submissions read by boards and supervisors, where the numbers had to survive scrutiny, not just look complete. I've also led system implementations end to end, SimCorp Dimension and Clearwater Analytics, building operating models from the ground up rather than adapting existing ones, which is the same discipline complex acquisition and integration modeling requires.

I haven't worked on SaaS unit economics or run acquisition due diligence myself. My M&A-adjacent work has been on the accounting and reporting side of deals, not deal modeling or valuation.

Worth a call to see where the overlap is real.
