Re : Senior Finance Manager

Taking full ownership of finance for an organization scaling energy transition work means the close, the controls, and the payroll all rest on one person getting the fundamentals right from day one. That's a specific kind of pressure: no large team to lean on, no room for ambiguity in the numbers.

That's the environment I've worked in for most of the past decade. At CNP, I rebuilt investment accounting production under Solvency II constraints across 350 billion euros in assets, delivering the redesign in 18 months and on schedule, with reconciliations and controls that held up under regulatory scrutiny. Separately, I've led fast-close redesigns where the goal wasn't just faster reporting but fewer manual corrections downstream, cutting rework at each cycle. I've also built and cleared suspense accounts and constructed audit-ready journal entries via VBA when systems didn't talk to each other cleanly, the kind of hands-on fix that budgets and forecasts depend on being accurate in the first place.

I haven't managed payroll across an employer-of-record setup, and my German is functional rather than fluent for advisor-level discussions, so that piece would need support early on.

Remote-first is how I've worked for years now, most recently at Clearwater, coordinating closing cycles and controls across distributed teams without friction. Happy to walk through specifics on a call.
