I've spent 25 years in insurance transformation—claims, finance, regulatory compliance, operating model redesigns. This role isn't about managing change theory. It's about moving a complex programme forward when priorities shift and stakeholders pull in different directions. That's where I add the most value.

I've led comparable programmes: a three-year claims operating model redesign across a 500-person function (process mapping, technology selection, integration workstreams, stakeholder alignment across Finance, Actuariat, and IT). The result was 18% process efficiency gain and a successful migration to a new platform mid-transformation without losing momentum. I've also rebuilt a CFO-office governance structure for a regulated insurer managing 40+ concurrent reporting initiatives—the discipline and visibility framework I built there directly translates to keeping a transformation portfolio moving when complexity rises.

What matters in a role like this: you anticipate friction before it surfaces, you build relationships that actually work (not just compliance relationships), and you know when to simplify and when to hold the line. You also understand that insurance transformation isn't primarily a technology problem—it's a people, process, and discipline problem. I've seen programmes derailed by misaligned stakeholders and unclear accountabilities, not by technical debt.

I work as an independent consultant, which means I'm available immediately and built for interim/contract delivery. The trade-off is obvious: I'm not building internal culture or staying through the full three-year cycle, but for a programme this visible and this high-stakes, you probably value someone who arrives sharp and doesn't need a six-month ramp.
