I bring 25 years of insurance and finance experience—exactly the depth this role demands. I've spent my career in the room with CFOs, actuaries, and CIOs solving the problems that matter: regulatory reporting redesigns, operating model transformations, PMO delivery on programmes that can't slip. This is not theoretical knowledge. It's the kind of sector fluency that lets you see what others miss.

At Expert Zone Advisory, I've led mission-critical workstreams for major insurers: a three-year finance transformation for a €20B+ carrier (from process design through cutover, across 12 countries), regulatory reporting overhauls under Solvency II pressure, and CFO office restructuring when the stakes were high. I know where the real problems hide—in the gap between what the spreadsheet says and what operations can actually execute. I'm comfortable owning that gap end-to-end.

What appeals to me here is exactly what you've described: a firm where senior people own their clients and outcomes, where intellectual rigour meets real accountability, and where the partner track is visible. I've done enough committee-based consulting to know I work better when there's clarity of ownership and a real client relationship to defend. The boutique model, the founder pedigree from McKinsey and BCG, the focus on depth over speed—that's the environment where I do my best work.

One honest point: I've been independent for several years. I thrive that way, but I'm drawn to this because it combines the independence I value (owning your clients, minimal oversight) with the intellectual community and growth trajectory I can't build alone. This role feels like the right fit at the right moment.

I'd welcome a conversation about how to structure this—whether that's a hire, a longer trial, or something in between. I'm confident I can add material value to your insurance practice from day one.
