As a consultant who's spent 25 years in insurance and finance transformation, I've spent the last decade watching incumbents struggle with exactly what your job description targets: modernizing core operations while competitors rewrite the rules with technology and new models.

That's where I add value. I've led operating model redesigns and core platform transformations for insurance clients facing the same pressures you're asking consultants to solve—legacy underwriting processes, disconnected customer journeys, sprawling claims operations. On a recent mandate, I redesigned the finance and operations function for a mid-market insurer, restructuring workflows across underwriting and claims that cut process cost 22% while improving SLA compliance. The work required both deep technical insight into insurance workflows and the ability to align actuaries, IT leaders, and CFOs around a single vision. That combination is rare.

I'm based in France but I've worked across Europe for the past five years, and Zurich's insurance ecosystem is where I've done my sharpest work. I know the regulatory context, the competitive intensity, and what clients here actually need to compete.

One honest thing: I'm an independent consultant, not building a long career at a single firm. If you're looking for someone to grow within Deloitte's hierarchy over years, there may be better fits. But if you need someone who arrives with real insurance operating model expertise, proven delivery discipline, and the ability to shape strategy alongside clients at board level, I'm worth a conversation.
