I've spent 25 years in insurance and finance, and I know the gap between planning a program and actually delivering it on time and within budget. That's where I add the most value—sitting at the intersection of stakeholder alignment, technical reality, and execution discipline.

I'm a consultant, not a full-time employee, but I've led exactly the kind of programs QBE is describing. Two years ago, I ran a £3.2m transformation across finance operating model and regulatory reporting for a major insurer. Cross-functional teams, vendors, vendor management, scope creep, budget trade-offs—the full picture. We delivered on schedule, within 2% of budget, and I moved on. No politics, no empire-building.

What matters for this role: I understand insurance operations deeply enough to challenge assumptions that hide risk. I've managed CFOs, actuaries, IT leads, and compliance teams without needing translation. I'm comfortable saying "no, that timeline doesn't work" and then showing why and what does.

The honest gap: I'm freelance, not CDI. Some employers want permanence for permanence's sake. QBE's hybrid model and talk of flexible working suggest you're pragmatic about how work happens. If you need someone who owns outcomes over 18–24 months, knows the sector, and brings both teeth and judgment to the table, I'm worth a conversation.

I'm based in Paris but work across Europe. I have right to work in France and can discuss UK sponsorship once we know if this fits both ways.

Let's talk.
