Dear KERN Consulting,

Your role requires someone who can walk into a board room, cut through complexity, and move organizations forward—not just execute plans someone else designed. That's exactly where I add the most value.

I've spent 25 years in insurance and finance transformation, the last decade as an independent senior consultant. My sweet spot is the intersection of technical rigor, regulatory reality, and organizational alignment—precisely where KERN's clients operate. I don't do theory. I close deals, redesign operating models, and ship governance frameworks that actually stick because they're built with stakeholders, not imposed on them.

Two examples: I led a €50M+ finance transformation program for a top-tier insurer, managing 8 concurrent workstreams across actuarial, IT, and ops—delivered early and under budget. The shift from heroic delivery to repeatable process lifted their team's capacity by 35%. More recently, I mentored a team through a complex regulatory reporting overhaul that eliminated 6 manual reconciliation points. Both taught me the same lesson: clarity and discipline compound faster than brilliance.

I work best in environments where judgment matters more than process theater—where autonomy and accountability are the same thing. The partenariat model you describe appeals to me directly. I'm at a point where I'm ready to anchor my work in an organization's growth trajectory, not just project delivery.

The shift from freelance to CDI is intentional on my end. I want to build something.
