Re : Financial Services Consultant (Remote)

Advising on compliance and keeping transaction flows efficient for a gig-economy financial infrastructure client means building controls that hold up under regulatory scrutiny while transaction volume keeps growing. That's the kind of problem I've spent 25 years solving in insurance and finance, usually at the point where compliance, data, and delivery pressure collide.

At CNP, I rebuilt investment accounting production under Solvency II constraints: 350 billion euros in assets under management, delivered in 18 months, on schedule. That work required interpreting complex prudential regulation (Solvency II, IFRS 9's ECL and amortized cost rules) and translating it into working accounting schemes and controls, not just policy documents. On another mission, I implemented Clearwater Analytics end to end, from design through go-live, covering risk reporting and reconciliation for asset portfolios. That mission was run remotely, and hybrid delivery is a normal way of working for me. I've also built financial models and forecasts to support ALM and SCR calculations, and worked directly with client-facing teams to clarify reporting requirements during implementation.

I haven't worked inside gig-economy transaction structures specifically. My transaction-flow experience comes from insurance and asset management, including Swift flows and middle and back office processes.

As a contractor who is a non-UK Tax resident, based overseas, IR35 does not apply to me.

Happy to walk through how this maps to your client's compliance and reporting needs on a short call.
