Dear AXA Partners Hiring Team,

The Global Finance Tools Business Owner role aligns precisely with my operating model: I've spent 25 years bridging Finance and IT in insurance, turning fragmented tooling into standardized, compliant platforms that actually work.

What you need here—someone fluent in both business requirements and system architecture, comfortable arbitrating between Finance rigor and IT delivery constraints—is exactly where I've added the most value. I led finance transformation at a €2B+ insurance group where I redesigned the closing cycle across 12 entities, moved three separate consolidation tools onto one platform, and cut month-end labor by 35%. The hard part wasn't the technical roadmap; it was translating finance pain into IT capability, managing stakeholders who spoke different languages, and staying disciplined when scope crept.

I know AXA Partners operates across multiple geographies and entities, which means you're sitting on legitimate tool fragmentation. I've seen that picture before. The role demands someone who can own the strategy without disappearing into meetings—someone who can say no as much as yes, and who understands that tools serve process, not the reverse.

One honest point: I'm currently independent. I've chosen that model because the best interim roles let me focus entirely on execution without political overhead. A permanent role needs to land differently for me, but if the scope and autonomy match what's on paper, that conversation is worth having.

I'd welcome a call to discuss how the finance tooling landscape sits today and where the biggest friction points live. My calendar is open.
