Your Investment Reporting Team needs someone who can move quickly between complex asset valuation, regulatory reporting mechanics, and stakeholder alignment—and deliver reliably under deadline pressure. That's exactly where I've added the most value over 25 years in insurance and finance.

I've spent the last decade working on balance sheet projects that sit where yours does: at the intersection of IFRS compliance, Solvency II methodology, and asset-side complexity. Most recently, I led reporting redesigns for a major insurer where I redesigned discount rate workflows, built governance frameworks for multi-entity consolidation, and restructured how finance and actuarial teams handoff assumptions and results. The outcome was cleaner control environments, faster close cycles, and fewer downstream audit findings.

Before that, I managed similar technical finance programs—pension accounting overhauls, assumption governance, reporting architecture upgrades—where the pattern was always the same: the technical problem is usually solvable; the real work is getting Finance, Actuarial, and Operations on the same page about what the number means and who owns it.

I'm currently independent, which means I can start immediately and commit fully to a hands-on role. The trade-off is obvious: I'm not looking for a permanent seat, and you're not getting someone building a 30-year career at L&G. But for a manager-level role where you need both technical depth and the ability to stabilize a team under regulatory or strategic pressure, that can work.

I'd be useful in your Investment Reporting role, and I'm interested in exploring whether this is the right fit for both of us.
