I've spent 25 years building financial systems that survive scrutiny—regulatory, operational, and market-driven. Most of that time, I've worked exactly where SimCorp's clients live: the intersection of complex finance, technology implementation, and organizational change.

What matters here is not what SimCorp sells, but what clients actually need to believe to buy it. That's ROI clarity, executive alignment, and proof that the solution fits their operating reality. I've built those arguments for insurers and asset managers navigating multi-year transformations. I know how to ask the right questions before building the business case.

Two examples: I led a €15M financial reporting system redesign for a major insurance group—mapped the gap between what finance claimed they needed and what actuarial, compliance, and operations actually required. Delivered 30% process reduction, not through technology magic, but by forcing honest conversations early. Second, I restructured the PMO delivery model for an asset management client carrying legacy platform baggage; the reframing alone cut project friction by half and got buy-in from CFO down to operations heads because they saw themselves reflected in the plan.

The honest gap: I've worked freelance the last few years and thrived there. A principal role at SimCorp means I'm betting that your mission—helping clients win through better financial technology—beats independence. It has to. The trade is real. I'm looking at it clear-eyed.

I'm ready to talk through how a 25-year insurance and finance operator adds value to your advisory model. My calendar's open.
