I am writing to apply for the Finance Operations Senior Manager role at Tokio Marine HCC.

For the past 25 years, I have worked exclusively in insurance and finance, building expertise in exactly what this role demands: operations delivery under regulatory pressure, process redesign, and driving adoption of automation and control frameworks. Most recently, I led finance operations transformation programmes where I redesigned cash management and accounts payable workflows, implemented control enhancements, and delivered measurable efficiency gains—the kind of continuous improvement culture this role is chartered to build.

I've managed teams through significant change. At my last engagement, I oversaw a treasury and cash operations rebuild for a complex, multi-entity insurance group, establishing new forecasting disciplines and tightening liquidity controls while coordinating with wider finance system upgrades. That experience taught me how to balance day-to-day operational rigour with sponsoring longer-term transformation—which is exactly what your Finance Change capability and Target Operating Model work require.

I am honest about one thing: I have spent the last five years as an independent consultant. That was deliberate, and it has sharpened my delivery discipline and stakeholder clarity. But the Finance Operations role is a permanent leadership position where I can build something more durable. I'm looking to return to a full-time post that offers scale, strategic depth, and a team I can develop over time.

I'm based in France currently and have lived and worked in London before. A hybrid model with three days in-office works well for my situation, and I can be available to start within notice.

I would welcome a conversation about how my operational background and transformation experience align with TM HCC's Finance Operations priorities.

Yours sincerely,

Xavier Robitaille
