I bring 25 years of finance and insurance transformation experience—exactly what you need to launch and scale the IAS Value Team. My background sits at the intersection of technical delivery, regulatory complexity, and operating model redesign, which is precisely where this role creates the most value.

Over the last decade, I've built and led high-performing delivery teams through similar horizontal transitions. At a major French insurer, I restructured their finance operating model across 12 countries, shifting from siloed teams to outcome-focused value streams. The result: 40% faster close cycles, 60% reduction in control defects, and a team structure that survived three organizational restructures. I've managed PMO governance, technical configuration teams, and cross-functional stakeholders—CFO offices, actuarial, compliance, operations—all pulling in different directions. That experience translates directly to building the IAS Value Team's outcome-focused structure.

I understand the SimCorp context: you're moving from traditional enterprise software to services delivery, which requires leadership that's comfortable with both technical depth and client-centric operations. I've done this twice—once in insurance transformation consulting, once embedding inside a financial services organization as interim Finance Manager. I know how to design teams that can plan, configure, build, test, and operate solutions without creating organizational silos.

One honest note: I'm currently structured as an independent consultant. If this role requires a traditional employment contract, I'm open to discussing that shift, though I'd want clarity on expectations around flexibility and long-term engagement given my consulting background.

I'm based in Europe and have worked across multiple timezones—Copenhagen is straightforward. I'd welcome a conversation about how to structure this transition and what you need from a Head of IAS Value Team in your first 90 days.
