I've spent 25 years solving exactly this problem in insurance: taking complex, multi-stakeholder transformation programs from strategy to execution without losing either rigor or momentum. That's what MetLife needs here, and that's where I drive the most value.

Your distribution transformation spans three critical layers—partner ecosystems, direct-to-consumer, and data platforms—each with its own technical complexity, regulatory surface, and organizational resistance. I've led programs with that exact topology: redesigning operating models across Spain and Portugal, aligning Finance, Actuariat, and IT around a single product roadmap, and moving senior stakeholders from debate to decision. The difference between a transformation that lands and one that stalls is rarely the strategy. It's the person who owns the end-to-end accountability, builds the right governance spine, and translates between business language and engineering reality without breaking either one.

At a major insurer, I led a cross-functional program redesigning the finance operating model across three countries—different regulators, different accounting standards, different IT maturity. Same job: single point of accountability, multiple interdependent streams, senior stakeholder influence, value-driven execution. We delivered on time. More importantly, the organization kept running it after I left because the ways of working were real.

One honest note: I'm a consultant. I thrive in this kind of role, but I've chosen to stay independent. If you're building toward a permanent Transformation Lead, that matters. If you need someone who can hit the ground with full authority and depth on day one, who won't get lost in organizational politics, and who will have this program structured and moving within eight weeks, then this conversation makes sense.
