I'm a PMO and value management consultant with 25 years in insurance and finance. I've spent the last decade building PMO functions that actually stick—designing governance frameworks, embedding portfolio discipline, and delivering measurable value from large transformation programmes.

What I'd bring to Arch: I've done exactly this role twice before. At a major French insurer, I rebuilt their PMO from scratch, took on Programme PMO Lead for a €40M digital transformation, and designed a portfolio governance model that reduced project overruns by 35% within 18 months. I line-managed small teams doing the same split you describe—governance reporting and benefits tracking. The difference was clarity: clear frameworks, realistic forecasting, and the ability to tell executives what's actually happening versus what they want to hear.

I know the Arch context—regulated insurance, complex stakeholders (actuarial, IT, operations), pressure to measure value realistically. That's where my experience lands. I've built portfolio financials tracking for Solvency II environments. I've designed cost and benefit realisation dashboards for sceptical CFOs. And I understand that PMO credibility comes from governance that enables delivery, not bureaucracy that slows it.

There's one practical question: I'm currently freelance (Expert Zone Advisory SAS) and mostly working on interim mandates. Arch will need to confirm whether you're open to contractors for this role, or if you're specifically seeking a permanent hire. Both work for me, but I'd rather flag it directly.

I'm in France now but spent four years living in London. I speak fluent English and work comfortably across UK, European, and international organisations.
