I'm writing to apply for the Head of New Business Reporting role at Legal & General's Institutional Retirement business.

Over 25 years in insurance and finance, I've spent most of my career exactly where this role sits: at the intersection of actuarial rigour, regulatory reporting, and operational delivery. I've led finance transformation programmes where the stakes were high—Solvency II compliance, bulk annuity pricing, IFRS implementation—and learned that robust new business reporting isn't just a process; it's how leadership makes decisions that stick.

My last two years running a consulting practice reinforced this. I built reporting frameworks for insurers facing similar pressures: tightening margins, regulatory scrutiny, teams under pressure to deliver faster without breaking governance. One client, a mid-sized protection insurer, had new business reporting scattered across three systems with no single source of truth. We redesigned it end-to-end—data model, controls, hand-offs—and cut month-end close time by 40% while actually improving audit readiness. That's the kind of clean, unglamorous work that compounds.

I know the L&G environment: the scale of your book (£86bn), the complexity of institutional bulk annuity pricing, the need to thread IFRS and Solvency II requirements without creating silos. I've managed teams through similar transformations and genuinely enjoy the detail work—actuarial, financial, operational—that makes reporting credible.

One honest note: I've worked as an independent consultant for the past two years, not in a permanent role. I'm looking to move back into a substantive leadership position where I can build something that lasts beyond a project cycle.

I'd welcome a conversation about how I'd approach this role.
