Re : Senior Director, Accounting & Controlling

Building a global accounting function that can support fundraising, M&A, and IPO readiness while running on AI-enabled workflows is a different mandate than keeping the books closed on time. It asks for someone who can hold technical accounting judgment and process transformation in the same hand, across entities and time zones.

That combination has been the core of my work for 25 years in insurance and finance. At CNP Assurances, I rebuilt the investment accounting production line under Solvency II constraints, covering 350 billion euros in assets, delivered on an 18-month timeline with no slippage on regulatory deadlines. The work required exactly what this role asks for: technical depth in complex accounting areas, a redesigned operating model, and a control environment built to survive audit scrutiny. On the systems side, I've led implementations of SimCorp Dimension and Clearwater Analytics end to end, from design through production cutover, including the data migration and UAT phases where most transformation programs actually fail. That's the same discipline needed to scale accounting operations across multi-jurisdiction, multi-entity structures without losing control quality.

I haven't worked inside a SaaS or recurring-revenue business model directly. My technical accounting work has been built around insurance and asset management structures, not subscription revenue recognition.

Remote-first collaboration has been standard practice for me, most recently at Clearwater, working async across distributed teams. Happy to walk through the CNP program in more detail if useful.
