With 25 years in financial services transformation, I've spent my career exactly where BlackRock's GFDS EMEA team operates: managing complex change across regulated environments where execution precision matters as much as strategic clarity.

What caught my attention in your brief is the specific challenge—owning high-impact transformation initiatives across distributed teams while maintaining alignment with both regulatory requirements and operational reality. That's the type of mission where I've consistently delivered.

Most recently, I led a process redesign for a major European insurance group's CFO office, restructuring their regulatory reporting and closing cycles. The work involved coordinating Finance, Actuariat, Risk, and IT teams across three geographies—not unlike your Transfer Agency and Fund Distribution operations. The outcome: 40% reduction in month-end close time, tighter control frameworks, and a scalable model that absorbed new regulatory requirements without friction. The key wasn't complexity management; it was clarity. I built governance structures that made trade-offs visible and decisions defensible.

Earlier, I redesigned the operating model for a pension and insurance transformation programme worth €50M, serving as interim Finance Manager. Same pattern: inherited fragmented processes, multiple stakeholders pulling different directions, strict compliance boundaries. Delivered a phased roadmap that protected existing revenue while building modern capabilities. No slipped milestones.

One honest note: I'm currently independent (Expert Zone Advisory), which means you'd be evaluating a senior freelancer for what reads like a permanent VP role. That's worth clarity upfront. I've worked this way intentionally—it lets me focus entirely on outcome delivery without organizational politics. If BlackRock is building this role around someone who can own outcomes and navigate ambiguity across EMEA's complexity, that model works. If the role requires long-term organizational integration, it might not.

I'd like to understand your timeline and what success looks like in year one. My background suggests I could deliver it. Let's talk if the fit makes sense.
