I'm a transformation consultant with 25 years in insurance and finance. I've spent my career at the exact intersection HDI is navigating: aligning technical complexity, regulatory constraints, and delivery pressure—the hard part of transformation that most managers struggle with.

What you need is someone who moves from strategy to execution without losing either thread. I've redesigned finance operating models, led cross-functional PMO governance, and built the communication architecture that lets technical change land with business stakeholders. At one major insurer, I owned a three-year finance transformation touching actuarial, compliance, and IT systems simultaneously—the kind of scope where clarity and discipline separate success from stalled projects.

I know the German insurance playbook. I've worked extensively with Cologne-based teams and understand the regulatory weight and cultural expectations. I'm fluent in the language both speak—analytic rigor and stakeholder management.

The honest gap: I've been independent for several years. I'm not looking for a permanent role because consulting suits my rhythm. But I also believe some problems deserve commitment that contract work can't fully offer. HDI's transformation scope, the senior mandate, and the opportunity to build something durable—that's the kind of work that pulls me toward CDI. I'm genuinely interested in testing whether this is the right move.

Let's talk. My calendar is open, and I can walk you through specific delivery examples in detail.
