With 25 years in finance and insurance operations, I've spent my career solving exactly the problems SimCorp's clients face: tightening settlement windows, managing regulatory complexity, and building the operational backbone that institutions depend on.

I've led several transformations where the stakes matched yours—redesigning post-trade processes for a major European insurer, rebuilding reconciliation workflows to handle multi-asset portfolios at scale, and implementing control frameworks that passed regulatory audits under pressure. These weren't theoretical exercises. I worked directly with operations teams, finance, and compliance to move from fragmented legacy systems to integrated, real-time reporting—the kind of institutional-grade execution your product roadmap demands.

What matters here is that I understand both sides of this equation. I've been the client frustrated with brittle post-trade infrastructure. I've also been the operator responsible for delivering solutions that work at scale. I know the gap between what product teams imagine and what operations teams actually need.

There's an honest gap: I've built my career as an interim consultant and founder, not in permanent executive roles. But for the right mission—one where I can contribute directly to strategy, delivery excellence, and client outcomes—I'm ready to anchor down. SimCorp's positioning in post-trade and the quality of your client base make this compelling.

I'm based in France now but have worked across Europe and am open to London. I'd be worth a conversation to explore whether my experience translates to what you're building.
