As a senior strategy consultant with 25 years in finance and insurance, I've spent the last decade building and scaling complex transformation programs across large organizations. Deutsche Börse's Post Trading division needs someone who can translate strategic intent into executable roadmaps while holding governance tight—that's exactly where I've added the most value.

My last three years as an independent consultant have focused on program delivery and stakeholder alignment in heavily regulated environments. At a top-20 French insurer, I led the design and execution of a three-year finance operating model transformation across six business units and three countries. The scope included process redesign, technology roadmap alignment, and regulatory reporting overhaul. We delivered on time and under budget while maintaining parallel operations. That required the same cross-divisional discipline, risk management, and executive communication your team needs.

Before that, I spent eight years in CFO offices and PMO roles managing portfolios of simultaneous initiatives—each with competing priorities, technical complexity, and stakeholder pressure. I'm comfortable running governance forums, building transparent KPI dashboards, translating regulatory or market constraints into strategic decisions, and escalating fast when needed.

The honest gap: I'm a freelance consultant, not an employee. I know that matters for some roles. But if you're looking for someone who can hit the ground running on day one with zero ramp-up, who won't need training on financial controls or complex program management, and who understands both the technical and political side of transformation in regulated markets—I'm a strong fit.

Happy to discuss how my background maps to your delivery challenges.
